

Should Mobile Phones Be Allowed In School?

In modern years, children under the age of 16 have been taking their mobile phones to school. Some people believe that having a phone to school is a great idea because they could use it for educational use ; others think it's a ridiculous idea because it could get stolen if password-free .9 out of 10 people own a phone and 2/3 of them take it to school.

For example, if parents want to know what you have been learning in school you could show them the video they've recorded. Moreover, if people take videos they maybe wouldn't understand or they forgot how to do their homework they could then watch the video and understand it. They could also use a video for cyber-bullying they might do that by: emailing and texting .Also they might post the video on social media and make fun of them.

Some people say to have a phone in school because they could contact parents if in an emergency .Such as, if you get lost. Students parents might be worrying about them then they could tell them your at a club or going to be 5-10 minutes late. On the other hand, it might get stolen if password-free or the phone could get hacked.

Some people say think to have a phone in school in school for educational use such as research for topic, literacy .etc. Similarly, they could also use a calculator and stopwatch for numeracy.

They could also have a remainder to hand their homework in. However, it can also be a distraction in class like if their mum or dad phone they will pick it up and it will make other people stare and children could get low grades on exams. And they might also be texting while teacher is teaching.

Schools should have to balance the wish for children having to bring in their mobile phones for educational use. While it could be a bad reason because it might get stolen if password free. So schools should thoroughly think if children under the age of 16 should have a phone in school.
